Check out the tools page for a complete list of what we have and what we are working on, and you can check out the news to see what is happening with devkitPro. Please don't forget to come and check out the forums, or get in touch with us on facebook or twitter for any questions, concerns, bug reports, or feature requests! We always love to hear your feedback. Hi all, I'm writing this as I'm working on a new Proton website. This is an ongoing project, so please bear with us as we build it from the ground up. The site is already live at and all of the devkits can be found here. So what are the benefits of using a Proton site? A community is formed around a devkit, which allows people who have the devkit to share their work and progress. Devkits can be easily shared to the sites, so that other people can benefit from your work, and vice versa. Devkits are the same price on each of the sites, so the price is irrelevant (price is included in the devkitPro page). There is no restriction on sharing of devkits, meaning, you can publish your toolchains to sites that you don't want others to get access to (like an open source project), and other users can browse the devkitPro page and get free tools to use. This is how it should work, we would never want devkitPro to be a paid service. A big issue with Nintendo consoles has been getting access to homebrew, and in particular, getting access to the GameCube devkit. Until now, this has been very difficult. Proton, and other Nintendo 3DS Devkits, have been making it very easy to get homebrew tools. But so far Nintendo has refused to make the GameCube devkit available, which has held homebrew back for many years. It's about time we fix this, and get more GameCube tools out there. If you don't want the devkitPro community to be able to get access to your devkit, you need to visit the community section of the devkitPro website and set your settings to prevent sharing. We are making some changes to the layout of the devkitPro website, and it is expected that the devkitPro page will be temporarily unavailable while this is in progress. We will update the 82157476af
